A commitment to peace requires us to look beyond our own interests to the good of all.

Peace is something we all often long for. Even the idea of an International Day of Peace (21 September) soothes and warms us. Our images of peace are various, but they are always happy.

St Augustine, a sharp observer of his world, said that in all we do we seek peace. That seems an extraordinary thought when we look at the world around us – full of war, violence, social media pile-ons. Augustine's point was that even when nations went to war, they wanted peace – on their own terms. This is true also in domestic disputes and shouting matches in the media. We want the kind of peace that comes from winning the conflict. In reality, however, the peace that follows war is often a city burned to the ground. A Roman writer spoke of the Roman Empire when he said, 'They make a desert and call it peace.'
